For several decades hypertension has been considered to be a stress-related condition. It is generally accepted that in order to maintain blood pressure (BP), the kidney senses the level of BP via baroreceptors and the sympathetic nervous system, and responds by releasing adrenal catecholamines, which in turn evoke release of plasma renin. This renin-angiotensin system augments peripheral vascular resistance, thus preventing further elevation of BP. In essential hypertension, the baroreceptor function is intact, and the renin-angiotensin system is operative. The question as to what extent it is a result of the chronic neurogenic and/or the autonomic nervous system hyperactivity and to what extent it is due to structural damage of the vessel wall remains open. Plasma renin activity may be elevated or normal in essential hypertension. Plasma renin activity can be suppressed by substances which are more powerful than angiotensin II and/or by prorenin, which is a more potent vasoconstrictor than angiotensin I in vitro, and is formed in the plasma by the alternative pathway. Additionally, the thiocyanate-hydrogen ion production is greater than in normotensive subjects and in responsive essential hypertension. A number of the acute responses to angiotensin II, norepinephrine and potassium are similar in essential hypertension and in animal experimental models. Whether hypertension per se causes metabolic change and whether these metabolic changes are related to the pathogenesis of the hypertensive state are not known. } else { throw new IllegalArgumentException("The specified image format is not supported" + " by this plugin.
