The disposition of [3H]vincristine was studied in six adult female mongrel dogs. Each dog was given intravenous infusions of either [3H]vincristine (3.7 micrograms/kg/min for 120 min) or [14C]inulin (10.8 micrograms/kg/min for 120 min) at intervals of approximately 24 h. The total administered radioactivity for the vincristine study was 3.1 MBq/kg; for the inulin study, 5.2 MBq/kg. At the end of each infusion, blood samples were collected for 3 h. When the vincristine infusions were repeated at intervals of 24 h, the first-pass effect was the same for both infusions. In contrast, for the inulin infusions the first-pass effect was a decreasing function of the number of successive infusions given (first-pass effect = 58%, 71%, and 67% for the first, second, and third infusions, respectively). The first-pass effect for vincristine was the same for all infusions (first-pass effect = 73%). There was no evidence of any accumulation of [³H]vincristine in the organism 5b5f913d15
