Mobile cellular covers all important aspects of cellular and mobile communications, from the Internet to signals, access protocols, and more. This definition includes the whole complex of working with the phone: from reading TV programs and listening to the radio to using the phone for its intended purpose (Bluetooth function). Flexibility. Allows the operator to cover an area over a longer distance than a cellular network by wire or radio. All-big connection. With broad coverage and 24/7 network presence, operators can offer more services than with a single base station. At the same time, the cost of ownership will decrease, which is very important when integrating with other networks and network structures. All of the above applies to an existing cellular network, i.e. at her service. The new cellular telephone network will operate in the field of wireless communications. The most important services will be in the area of Wi-Fi, the fastest and most convenient way to transfer data. This applies to both mobile telephone networks and broadband network technologies based on proprietary technologies. Cellular networks are developing faster than mobile phones. The reason for this is the ever-increasing requirements for functionality, volume and cost of services. A modern telephone is required to have good performance (class 2-3 is best) with reasonable (2-3) and inexpensive use (high quality and cost). All this allows wireless networks to "stick" - to remain relevant in the market, thanks to the ever-increasing demand for quality and cost.

5.1.3 Description of the network topology

Unlike the classical hierarchy of network nodes, the data transmission device is located at the ends of the networks. At the same time, the Ethernet standard (Ethernet protocols) is the least formalized version of building high-speed networks. This is especially true for the Internet. Unfortunately, describing a specific topology and topology function for absolutely different network networks is not an achievable task. Therefore, in this section, we will consider the role and place in the structure of the mobile network of each element: User (Visitor) - a system that provides technical support, customers, as well as interaction management in customer service and network administration. Compliant is a system that is fully integrated with other network components to provide predictability, consistency, and integrated co-
