Symantec's Norton Security Scan is mostly promoted through advertisements displayed on the desktop and both Norton and its sister brands are implicated in it. It offers a light-weight utility to show you the security status of your computer and to investigate and protect your PC from different malware elements. The main purpose of this application is to provide you with an accurate insight into your system's security status. It is based on the detection of malware elements and possible security vulnerabilities that might not be properly looked after by Norton anti-virus and Firewall products. While not being the flagship of the company, the software offers a chance to display to other Norton products what your personal computer can or cannot do. There are a few reasons why this might seem suspicious to you: Flaky advertising for Norton products

First of all, the size of the application. It seems like it would be much bigger than it is. The lack of cloud-based scanning technology and the fact that Norton has to keep a large number of processes running further add to its suspicious nature. So how does it work? Norton Security Scan receives data from the PC's network card to identify active components in the system. The manufacturer itself recommends that this process should take place automatically, while that may not be the case, it is still a good feature to have. Norton Security Scan can search for malicious extensions and cookies and notify the user about the dangerous ones that have found their way into the system. This is an opt-in function, so you must give permission to the tool in order to use it. Besides security and cookie issues, it also identifies and removes dubious browser extensions, mostly web-browsers' ones and auto-updates both the main product and the added ones. What is interesting, the software assesses both Flash and Java vulnerabilities and it also updates the latest versions of both programs. What is Norton AntiVirus? Norton Anti-Virus gives you the best way to combat against the highest number of potentially dangerous threats. By using it, you will be able to keep your PC protected without any hassle. It is an extensive set of security tools that will keep you from all kind of malicious software.
