I'm currently reading through this paper about the ϵ -machine learning algorithm. One of the main reasons for the authors using an ϵ -machine learning algorithm is that the machine learning algorithm has an exponential number of time complexity (the number of training samples is exponentially big in the problem size). I was wondering, why does the machine learning algorithm need an exponential number of training samples in order to be able to learn? Can we do somehow training less samples and be able to reach the same accuracy? A: Heuristically, higher accuracy means finer partitioning. If the accuracy isn't good enough, some rule could be learnt, but in the case of over fitting, it will end up with relatively coarse classifications. Generally, this is avoidable by training on smaller datasets. This doesn't directly answer your question, but provides some general insights for solving the issues with small training dataset. --O special teams played a large role in the team's performance. Shayne Graham's blocked punt was returned five yards for a score by De'Vion Posey, another blocked punt recovered by Chase Farris, and a blocked field goal that gave the ball back to the Dolphins. The blocked kick total was the most since the team's win against the Titans. The Dolphins' punt coverage was not very good. The unit gave up 24.4 yards per punt. However, this was a good thing, as a longer punt provides better field position and more time for the offense. With the special teams being good, and the offense playing well, the Dolphins played competitively. The offense scored 21 points, made some key special teams plays, and scored two touchdowns. Some things that may be worth mentioning are the offensive line played well. Chris Clemons looked good and Trent Brown looked like Trent Brown. Kevin Olsen didn't get a lot of playing time, but when he did, his snaps were good. The outside receivers didn't have a lot of opportunities, but did grab a few passes. Jesse Davis also had a very good game. As for the special
