You have several options at your disposal, according to the file format - JPEG, GIF or PNG. So, you can configure JPEG options (e.g. adjust quality, select the chrome subsampling, apply a grayscale filter), metadata settings (e.g. remove IPTC info and the EXIF profile) and make image adjustments (e.g. brightness, contrast, gamma). When it comes to the GIF and PNG extensions, you can select a color reduction method, specify the value to reduce colors to, as well as select the color quantization algorithm. In addition, you can zoom in and out of the image, switch to batch mode, rotate, flip or resample the image, switch to batch mode and includes a well-drawn help file with hints. This application optimizes images, combining the capabilities of both EXIF and IPTC data. The compression rate is so much higher that JPEG quality is no longer an issue and the file size is reduced by up to 90%. The name, however, "ImageOptim" is a misnomer. The application reduces images only if the image metadata is stored in the JFIF format, and that's it. In addition, it offers no visual or semantic support and is therefore unsuitable for all-around image optimization. That being said, ImageOptim is a useful tool for optimizing images with EXIF metadata in a file. It also includes an image-improving facility that converts JPEG images to JFIF format to quickly minimize the file size.
