Surgical excision of lesions in the form of basal cell carcinoma (BCC) and squamous cell carcinoma (SCC) of the skin are routine procedures in managing patients with this cancer. However, these treatments may be complicated by wound healing problems and may be associated with scarring. IgG liposome, which is a novel immunomodulator, was used in this study to evaluate its effect on treatment of skin cancers. Guinea pig model of BCC and SCC was used to develop lesions on abdominal skin. IgG liposomes were injected intralesionally in different concentrations (1.0, 0.5, 0.1 ml IgG liposome) every other day for 6 weeks. With each lesion, wound healing was assessed. After 6 weeks, the length and height of each tumor were measured. The growth rates of the BCC and SCC were significantly reduced in the IgG liposome treatment groups as compared to the control (P Zimbabwe economists say new American sanctions will hurt Zimbabwe's economy, especially the private sector.
