Dependence on the opiate, morphine, in rats produced a reduction in the ability to induce hyperthermia in response to norepinephrine. The degree of this effect was dependent upon the time of testing after morphine withdrawal and the number of previous morphine treatments. This reduced effect of morphine on the norepinephrine-induced hyperthermia was antagonized by the opiate antagonist, naloxone. The morphine-induced lowering of the norepinephrine-induced hyperthermia was also observed in rats given morphine once daily, and after a single naloxone-precipitated morphine withdrawal. This effect was not observed after a single morphine-induced-withdrawal. These data suggest that tolerance to the effect of morphine on the norepinephrine-induced hyperthermia may be mediated by opiate receptors.

The mid-1990s marked a period in the conservation of historic campuses of higher education in the United States.

More than 130 of the nation's colleges and universities have created, or are in the process of creating, master planning charters for the preservation of campus environments. A long-awaited national report issued Tuesday, Dec. 17, from the State Preservation Institute details the results of a study on campus conservation and describes the college campus as the last stronghold of the country's natural resources. The 109-page report, "Campus Conservation: A National Study," was authored by Dr. David E. Bromige of the University of Minnesota's College of Food,

Agricultural, and Natural Resource Sciences and assistant professor of urban and regional planning. “The study shows that the campus is a last-ditch stronghold of nature that is being slowly but steadily eroded by development and modernization,” said Bromige.
