It's not just Zagster (a company that rents out bikes from various different suppliers) with a large network of places to rent bikes, but also existing companies like LimeBike. But LimeBike's 15 to 20 mile range may make it easier to create DIY one-way bike lane networks, because the Zagster fleet is more likely to be larger and dispersed. In 2015, over 100,000 people in Austin bike to work (7.5% of Austin workers do not use a car to get to work) and others go for weekend rides with friends or family. This is a key demographic that LimeBike is targeting and it makes sense for them to be involved in the bike sharing/rental business. Across the US, the highest rates of cycling are in the largest cities. Even in the long-touted golden city of Austin, people rarely cycle in the city proper (only 50,000 people cycle to work daily in the city and across the county the numbers are much lower). Austinites can travel to and from the city without using a car, but when they are there they may not be wanting to ride a bike to their meeting, or being able to ride a bike. I don't want to get into the complex economics of the bicycle sharing business, but there's a business model that is very good for city centers and maybe not so great outside of cities. LimeBike, like Zagster, may be targeting people who live outside of city centers and may be interested in less-traveled, one-way routes to their home or to work. This is why it may be more difficult for a traditional bike rental company to set up short-range, one-way bike networks as Zagster appears to be, but this is what bike sharing is about. LimeBike plans to launch a oneway rental network in Austin by the end of the year. "If we start investing in Austin, we have a lot of advantages. We're a local company and we're a first mover. Our user base is super engaged and there's a huge appetite. So we plan to
