[Role of the urogenital tract in the etiology of infertility. One year's results of a prospective clinical study. The study group of the contraception center of the University of Vienna]. 80% of more than 1000 couples studied in the contraception centre of the University of Vienna over the past year have been found to be infertile. The etiology of their infertility was studied with gynecologic as well as urologic and sperm examination as well as PAP test and cervical mucus examination. The results showed that only 50% were genuinely infertile, while 50% were malingerers. The invention relates to a valve train of an internal combustion engine, in particular a valve train of an internal combustion engine with camshaft adjuster. There are various ways of designing the valve train of internal combustion engines, an object being to get the valve train into a position optimal for the engine type. A great amount of components and assembly costs are incurred and enormous weight is built into the valve train. Therefore, it is advantageous if a valve train constructed according to the invention can be inserted in a very simple manner into an already existing engine, if possible, and can operate without great effort. One approach toward designing the valve train as an engine-type independent assembly of the valve train and of the cylinder head of the engine is presented in the publication "Automobiltechnische Zeitschrift", 2007, pages 314 to 322 and also in the publication "Proceedings of the Second International Conference on Electronic and Electrical Engineering and Electronic Control Technology" (in English), pages 452 to 455. However, the individual components of this design are not provided with special securing members or recesses for securing the components to each other, or the components are secured together by means of conventional fastening screws. Further, the use of an E-shaped end on a rocker arm as a tappet seating and a recess for assembling the engine as a unit with the rocker arm and the valve spring retainer are used, the valve spring retainer being provided with an angular lever in the manner of a torque lever. Thus, a torque lever is produced in the manner of an additional component of the valve train, which,
