The NYPD's counterterrorism unit is headed by officials with long experience fighting terrorism, but a report released Wednesday found the NYPD does not have enough resources to track and investigate terror threats, at least when compared to other police departments. The Intelligence Unit, or the Intelligence Division of the Bureau of Counterterrorism, which is known as B.T.I., was responsible for 65 percent of terrorism arrests in the city from 2011 to 2013, a significant achievement that still fell well short of other departments, according to the report from New York Civil Liberties Union. The organization, which has offices on both sides of Manhattan, obtained the information through the Freedom of Information Law. The report found the NYPD lacks a robust system to track and investigate terror threats that are more common than other crimes. A recent survey by the NYPD found that 93 percent of respondents said they saw the threat of terrorism in their city, but only 8 percent had a current terrorism investigation. "When you have fewer resources, they are prioritized," said Eunice Kim, a staff attorney for the New York Civil Liberties Union. In addition to the investigation, the NYPD also has to cope with the daily threat of attacks by lone wolf terrorists, Kim said. "They can't be everywhere, so they have to do their investigations with the information they have, so that means they have to prioritize the cases that they want to invest in 5b5f913d15
