Solution to Exercise 3 Boles M A B Cengel.Appellate courts have stepped in repeatedly to prohibit the decision of a trial court to order removal of a child to another state even when there was evidence of long-standing and severe problems in the home of the parent. See Matter of Peterson, 610 So.2d 1175 (Fla. 2d DCA 1993); Diaz, 684 So.2d 121. Appellee contends that a trial court may remand a child even if there is evidence of long-standing problems if a legitimate purpose is served. Appellee argues that the court here did not order removal for the purpose of obtaining custody, but to prevent reunification of the father and child in state or federal custody. Appellee urges that unless removal is justified as a means of reuniting the child with a parent who has entered into a custody agreement, it would be a perversion of the state's parens patriae duties to order a child removed from her custody for the benefit of another party. Appellee urges that removal would be justified in this case because there was a realistic chance that D.H. could be returned to
