The use of smartphones in primary care: A systematic review. The widespread use of smartphones in primary care means that they could be used to support and improve clinical care. The aim of this review is to summarise and critique the research evidence to date on the use of smartphones in primary care. We searched the following databases: Embase, Medline, PsycINFO, CINAHL, BNI and Web of Science for peer-reviewed studies on smartphones in primary care, published from inception to June 2018. The review identified 26 studies (n = 4340), of which six reported on the use of SMS, six on the use of apps and 20 on the use of technology in general. There was limited evidence that using smartphones improved the clinical assessment or management of patients, particularly for symptoms and physical examination findings. Few studies examined whether the use of smartphones made a difference to patient outcomes or patient safety. All but one were retrospective case-notes reviews. No studies examined the cost-effectiveness or cost of smartphones compared to alternative interventions, nor did any studies examine the use of smartphones as a replacement for, or enhancement to, the traditional paper medical record. The use of smartphones in primary care is an emerging research area and the main evidence is currently in the form of case-note review. Small-scale studies of patient outcome suggest that smartphones are not yet ready for widespread adoption in primary care. There is a need for robust trials to examine the potential benefits of smartphones, as well as the risks of their use.

Snip from the wmgw Description: wmgw is a simple, easy to use image viewer designed with some tiny filters. The filters can transform one image into another. Many of them won't change your original image. But you can select a thumbnail below the picture to show before you decide if that image is a keeper. You can set the toolbar to show or hide and it's resizable. You can move it to the corner of the screen or in the middle. The png, jpg, jpeg and even lisp filters can export the image to a clipboard for storage, you can also save the image to a file and it will open in the default image viewer. The new file dialog allows for choices such as image only, jpeg only, png only, lisp, xbm, ico. wmgw is the original image viewer made with wmw.
