Cortical areas 4 and 13 are located at opposite sides of the post central sulcus, are catecholamine-innervated and abundant with 4-HPR binding sites. The anatomical distribution of 4-HPR binding sites is consistent with the distribution of catecholamine innervation in the cortex. However, the high density of 4-HPR binding sites in area 4 is puzzling, since that area receives no relevant catecholaminergic innervation from the basal forebrain and a direct projection is not available. The peptides and receptors involved are not known. Recently, we identified the 2-3-2-6-12-region of the dendritic glutamate transporter EAAC1 as the binding site of DADLE \[@r13]\]. It is not known whether the high density of receptors in the dendritic arbor of area 4 is linked to the glutamate transport system. We conclude that the density of cortical DADLE-receptors as found in the perirhinal cortex, is too low to provide significant effects on cortical excitatory neurotransmission. However, the distribution of the high density of 4-HPR binding sites indicates that this population of receptors is located in a distinct neuron type, other than 5-HT1A receptors or GABAB receptors.
