Translational components of eukaryotic ribosomes. Ribosome assembly is a complex process that involves the assembly of components of the 30S and 50S subunits, along with tRNA, RNA, and associated proteins. The large and small subunits associate to form a translationally active 80S ribosome. In this review we will discuss the different biogenesis pathways that have been used to study the transport and assembly of ribosomal proteins and ribosomal RNAs. Recent advances in cryo-electron microscopy have been critical to deciphering the 3D structure of ribosomes and have enhanced our understanding of the structural role of ribosomal proteins. These advances have also allowed the mapping of the different ribosomal protein binding sites of the 18S rRNA. Finally, new data that discuss the contribution of ribosomal proteins to the structure of the ribosome have enhanced our understanding of the 3D organization of ribosome assembly and the coordinated action of the various ribosomal proteins that together form the ribosome.
