The proliferation of wireless devices is creating a need for more efficient methods and apparatus for transmitting and receiving signals. In the case of transmission, conventional power amplifiers (PA) tend to use a considerable amount of energy. The current trend in wireless is toward the use of very small PA's in order to achieve increased battery life in mobile devices such as cellular telephones and the like. A major drawback to using such very small PA's is that their efficiency is typically low, thus requiring large batteries or a large number of smaller battery cells or the like in order to achieve the power levels necessary for the transmitting and receiving functions. The integration of PAs on a silicon chip is one approach that has been considered for the purpose of reducing the size of the power amplifiers and the number of batteries or battery cells needed to obtain a given power level. A major drawback to this approach is that high-power RF transmit signals need to be externally coupled to the silicon chip to provide sufficient power to drive the PAs. This external coupling may require an inductor to couple the power to the chip from a transmission line. The external coupling approach has a number of drawbacks. First, the external coupling arrangement can be quite complex. The external coupling inductor may be quite large and cause significant parasitic capacitance when implemented on the same chip as the PAs. Therefore, the signals to be transmitted must be heavily filtered to remove the image and spurs due to this external coupling capacitance before they enter the PAs. Second, the external coupling technique usually requires the PA to drive a load over a relatively long distance, resulting in a large PA and large battery capacity. Third, the transmission line coupler may not provide enough voltage margin for matching the PAs. Fourth, an external PA and coupler typically exhibits a high level of insertion loss, making the PAs and the coupler bulky. What is needed, therefore, are techniques for coupling PA's to a silicon chip that overcome the drawbacks of prior art external coupling techniques.
