The scenario of the xbox game is that one girl has all of the power.Q: Passing parameters as argument to a function in Python I am currently coding a simulation within a Python code to simulate transport phenomena in a one-dimensional regular array of molecules. The code is in the following : `import numpy as np def func(molecule, n_trans, v): molecule[n_trans, 0] = v[0] + 0.5*v[1] + np.random.random()*v[2] molecule[n_trans, 1] = v[1] - 0.5*v[2] + np.random.random()*v[2]` I wrote the code in this way since the use of the vector v might change. Actually I have to change some parameter within the program, so I intend to use a function in this way: `func(molecule, n_trans, v)` where the parameter v changes with time, but I do not know how to rewrite this code. How should I rewrite this code to achieve what I want? Thanks in advance for help. A: If you want to pass values as arguments to a function, you'd need to make them into parameters. That is, you'll need to write the function like this: `def func(molecule, n_trans, v): molecule[n_trans, 0] = v[0] + 0.5*v[1] + np.random.random()*v[2] molecule[n_trans, 1] = v[1] - 0.5*v[2] + np.random.random()*v[2]` So you could call func with a and b in the following way: `func(molecule, n_trans, v)` But there is no real need to write a function like that in the first place. It's useful for contrived examples that don't
