More particularly, it relates to a method for producing polyolefins having a narrow molecular weight distribution. Olefin polymers in general have excellent mechanical and chemical properties and therefore have been widely used in a variety of industries. Among the processes for producing olefin polymers, the present invention is concerned with an important process. More specifically, the present invention is directed to a process for producing olefin polymers having a narrow molecular weight distribution wherein a copolymerization reaction of olefins in the presence of metallocene-produced polyolefin is performed at a specific temperature range. Recently, olefin polymers have been formed into various shapes to meet the demands of the various industries. Therefore, it is important to produce olefin polymers having a narrow molecular weight distribution with good control of polymerization process. U.S. Pat. No. 4,100,272 discloses a process for producing polypropylene wherein a propylene-olefin mixture containing up to 50% by weight of ethylene is polymerized to a desired polymerization conversion in the presence of a vanadium-based catalyst. In a second step, the polymerization product is subjected to a crystallization process to give polymer pellets. The obtained pellet has a narrow molecular weight distribution of polypropylene and a narrow molecular weight distribution of crystallinity. However, the above-mentioned process requires an additional crystallization process for obtaining polypropylene having a narrow molecular weight distribution. U.S. Pat
