It's not your imagination: drug companies are full of human bias. How this week's Paradise Papers expose of global corruption and tax evasion is likely to influence the outcome of the US mid-term election

By NICK TANDON The Paradise Papers scandal has exposed a global corruption scandal. So, how will this impact politics? The Paradise Papers, which comprised more than 13 million leaked documents, have implicated high-profile figures in fraud and tax evasion. These include Donald Trump, Rupert Murdoch, Apple, Volkswagen and, of course, Amazon's Jeff Bezos, who owns the Washington Post - the globe's most influential corporate newspaper. However, it is widely believed that the Paradise Papers are connected to the mid-term election cycle which will also see the return of Trump, who is expected to announce his re-election bid. Others are examining whether the scandal could affect the outcome of next month's vote, which could in turn propel Democrats into control of the House of Representatives.

PwC and KPMG, two of the UK's big four accountancy companies, have been brought into the centre of the Paradise Papers scandal. According to the latest reports, the investigation is having "profound implications" on New York-based KPMG's business, which focuses on providing tax compliance advice. It is understood that the leak, which was revealed by the New York Times, has prompted an urgent audit of the Paradise Papers, which are stored across 30 different jurisdictions. Gareth Peirce, a partner at PwC's London office, told the Times that, "The investigation
