Republican presidential front-runner Donald Trump has tapped a longtime Republican operative with close ties to the party establishment to lead his vice presidential search, the Trump campaign announced Thursday. The Republican National Committee's executive director, Sean Spicer, and Kansas congressman Mike Pompeo, who has been in discussions with the Trump campaign about the job, were involved in the decision to name pollster and political strategist Frank Luntz to the position, the campaign said. In an exclusive interview with The Associated Press, Luntz said Trump needs to regain the trust of voters and broaden his appeal by reaching out to women and minorities. He said that the election could be closer than it looks, with a "tipping point coming" that could make or break Trump, as it did with Mitt Romney in 2012. He cautioned, however, that "it's a long process" and predicted a "nightmare scenario" for Trump if he bows out and loses on Election Day. Luntz's move to join the Trump campaign is one of the first big hires for the new administration. Spicer, who has been the subject of criticism from Trump and other candidates after the RNC changed its position on whether it could support the real estate mogul, is the highest-profile of what could be dozens of RNC hires in the new administration. "I'm a big fan of Frank," Spicer told the AP. "Frank will help us with our data, with messaging, with message discipline. We
