The present invention is applicable in systems that have a rotating magnetic recording disc with a slideable rigid platen for holding the disc in a still position. Conventional magnetic disc drive units typically have a rotating disc on which data is recorded magnetically by means of a transducer or magnet. The recording disc is mounted on a shaft or spindle which is journaled in a body portion of the unit so that it may be rotated by a motor at a desired speed. The magnet of the transducer is positioned adjacent the disc so that magnetic signals are recorded along data tracks on the disc. A rigid ceramic platen in the drive is biased by an arm, spring or the like against the opposing surface of the disc so that it may be moved radially inwardly to clamp the disc tightly against the outer periphery of the rotating spindle. The presence of the platen prevents movement of the disc relative to the spindle when the drive is not in operation so that contamination by airborne particles is prevented. Such contaminants can cause an electrical short which may damage or destroy the data being recorded on the disc. In addition, to prevent the flow of foreign matter from the platen to the disc, the platen is usually lubricated to reduce the coefficient of friction between the disc and platen. To provide a high degree of lubrication, a small amount of oil is typically applied to the platen surface. In conventional units, the spindle is mounted in a metallic housing. The housing may be further enclosed in a second housing. The two housings are separated by a pre-load spring which is contained in a spring chamber located in the housing or in the second housing. To separate the housings, additional parts and mechanisms are required which significantly increase the cost of the unit. In current units, the rotation of the spindle is transmitted through a sleeve to an output drive shaft which is coupled to the motor. The load applied by the spindle to the magnetic disc is carried through the sleeve. The sleeve is relatively inexpensive. The

The government also sought an extension of the Solicitor General's reply to this court's December 23, 2018, order on a PIL by NGO Common Cause. The court, however, said the reply would not be filed on Tuesday. The top court said Friday that it would take "appropriate notice" of the government's status report which was filed at the weekend and will be placed before it on January 3. The government had informed the court that it has not received anything from the defence ministry on these documents. Senior advocate Arvind Datar, appearing for the government, said the files which are related to the deal have been "received" by the Ministry of Defence. "We can have them provided to the Supreme Court and to the ministry of defence tomorrow or the day after tomorrow", he said. The apex court then said that it would "not entertain any application to discharge the judicial officer on the ground
