Virus-controlled MHC down-regulation in acute rejection. The pathogenesis of human acute allograft rejection is poorly understood. Rejection is known to be triggered by host mechanisms, including T lymphocyte responses to alloantigens. The T-helper 1 cell-derived lymphokine, interferon-gamma, can up-regulate the expression of major histocompatibility complex (MHC) class II in target cells and in graft tissue. Studies using murine models have suggested that this process might be involved in the rejection of both skin and liver allografts. We have now examined whether down-regulation of MHC class II by IFN-gamma also occurs in human graft tissue. Nine of 13 intensively pretreated patients with acute rejection of renal transplants showed an inverse correlation between IFN-gamma and class II expression, with a statistically significant reduction in MHC class II antigen per cell. HLA and class II phenotype of graft leukocytes could be reduced. Alternatively, IFN-gamma and tumor necrosis factor alpha might have been involved in the alteration of the MHC class II molecules. This is the first direct evidence of a physiologic down-regulation of MHC class II in graft tissue. Such alterations in graft tissue may mediate some of the changes in graft function and favor rejection, but the precise role of the altered MHC in promoting rejection must be determined.

Cerebrospinal fluid biomarkers as markers of neuroinflammation in a mouse model of sarcopenia induced by spinal cord injury. Sarcopenia is a syndrome characterized by progressive and generalized muscle loss with decreased mobility in chronic conditions, such as aging and spinal cord injury (SCI). Several studies have shown inflammation and oxidative damage in SCI mouse models, which may be responsible for reducing muscle size, though the existence of a strong

: March to Eternity Star Sky 3: March to Eternity (known in Japan as, and more simply or March to Eternity) is a 1990 platform video game developed and published by Gremlin Graphics for the Amstrad CPC, ZX Spectrum, Amiga and MS-DOS. It was an expensive but critical failure. The game was released under several names, including 'Star Sky III - March to Eternity' in some markets, and is promoted as a spiritual sequel to both Berzerk (1983) and Ork. It was never released in the UK. The game uses the famous Pink Floyd song "Fearless", released in 1979. 'Fearless' was licensed by Gremlin Graphics from S. H. Weintraub Music and reassigned to the main title screen as "March to Eternity". All other songs are original material. The game gives the player the chance to experience the voyages of Captain Francisco, using the current and 'future' version of the game. In the "current" version the game ends with Francisco as a ghost-like spirit in a spaceship drifting in space. The future version of the game gradually allows the player to push the story forward through time. By the end of the game, Francisco is still in the past, trying to save the 'current' version of himself from being destroyed by an asteroid. In an article in Game Zero magazine, Alex Angus described March to Eternity as "unique and beautiful" but also that it was "not for the faint hearted". The game sold poorly, and despite decent reviews, generally not well regarded critically. In the UK it was distributed by U.S. Gold but failed to sell due to the high price-tag. March to Eternity was derided by some reviewers when it was first published. Reviews Short of giving an average score for it ("It was terrible, but musty"), the Japanese magazine Electronic Gaming Monthly (EGM) awarded it 88 out of 100 for the Amiga, 91 out of 100 for the Spectrum and for the Amstrad CPC. EGM also gave it a large gold award for the console port. The 16-bit versions of EGM awarded March to Eternity scores of 65% (Amstrad CPC and Spectrum), 72% (Amiga) and 69% (ZX Spectrum), depending on which magazine published their review. Reviews of the ZX Spectrum version of March to Eternity in Crash Magazine were overwhelmingly negative. The
