SUMMARY/ABSTRACT There is a well-documented case of immunotherapy approval for non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) based on the identification of an immunogen.

Importantly, the tumor source is not necessarily vital. In fact, there is no shortage of NSCLC cases in which the tumor origin can be determined. Cytotoxic T cells are elicited by interferon- γ (IFN- γ) in response to the most immunogenic molecule found in most solid tumors, the tumor-associated antigen (TAA). TAA have been previously associated with a population of cancer cells found with a circular phenotype in solid tumor sections referred to as Circular Epithelial Reactive Loci (CERLs). Because of the high proportion of CERLs found in a given tumor, they could represent a higher-order structure of a tumor, whereas the remainder of the tumor will retain a much less immunogenic phenotype. Circular epithelial reactive loci (CERLs) were identified as a novel type of cancer stem cell in PD-1-expressing, p53-mutant NSCLC using genetic fate mapping and subsequent histological analysis. CERLs were shown to express multiple immune checkpoint molecules and to repress the effector T cell response in NSCLC. Specifically, PD-1 positive staining was shown to co-localize with CERLs in lung cancer tissues. These findings suggest that the CERLs were not only present in tumor stem cells but that they were also located in the tumor microenvironment. Although the function of CERLs in the tumor immune microenvironment was unclear, it was suggested that CERLs were able to divide between epithelial and mesenchymal lineages, indicating a potential mechanism for tumor progression. Because of the large proportion of tumor cells involved in the immune microenvironment and the easy identification of CERLs in human tumor data rates for a data stream of information and, in particular, to a system and method for utilizing the bandwidth of packetized information and its error correction capabilities to support multiple data rates. 2. Description of the Related Art Various data protocols may be used to provide communication between a sender and a recipient. For example, a Local Area Network (LAN) is a system of interconnected personal computer systems linked by a physical medium (e.g. a network of electrical, optical or wireless connections) that allows for the exchange of information between these systems. In a fiber optical Ethernet LAN, for example, the physical medium is typically an optical fiber cable, electrical wiring or wireless transmissions carried over a line. Ethernet is a common standard for such networks. Various types of computers are typically linked together by Ethernet networks and work more or less independently, depending on the design of the Ethernet network. Typical Ethernet networks comprise several segments, each of which acts as a networked LAN. Normally, each Ethernet LAN within an Ethernet network has its own network address. A network computer uses the “broadcast” function on the Ethernet LAN, thereby allowing the network computer to simultaneously transmit data to every other network computer. Data that is broadcast over an Ethernet LAN originates at a source station and travels from that station to a destination station on the LAN. A data packet may be transmitted over the Ethernet LAN in any number of ways. For example, data may be transmitted as a frame within a byte stream and the frame may be sent as a Synchronous Optical Network (SONET) cell, an Asynchronous Transfer Mode (ATM) cell, or the like d0c515b9f4
