Section Forum Last Post Deathsworn Rebellion GFASRP: The Ultimate Carrion Calling 2 posts [View Original]] 17th, 27.03.09 03:55 AM The idea of being transformed into a piece of meat and being eaten by another got me thinking about the dangers of single combat, and in particular, the potential for loss of life from a double danger: firstly, falling in combat, and secondly, being taken out by another. The same dilemma is faced by players new to Double/Death-Please System (DPS) combat. In order to simulate something like the typical RPG curve of die roll, and to give a little better experience for rookie players, I've provided what I thought was an approriate roll in the following manner: Step 1. Roll dice (six usually), and assign a score based on the die number (where 1 = best). Results in 3-6 = 8% chance of survival. We call this the Off-field roll. Step 2. Remain in 'field' with the player and keep at it until you're dead. This is called the On-field roll, and the player rolls for additional dice. If the On-field roll is successful, then the player continues. Otherwise the player stays out. My idea is to increase the difficulty by way of taking out players, thereby increasing the difficulty of the On-field roll. If the On-field roll is unsuccessful, then the player is KO'd (as in, you're finished) whether you stay in the game or not. Regardless of STRAIGHT FALL DAMAGE, there's a chance of death by KO. By the way, I'm not talking about rules like this: If you die on the field, then you're out of the game. If you lose out on the On-field roll, then you're out of the game regardless of injury, and dead regardless of how hard you were trying. This, for the most part, is how the game is played, except that I'm going to modify this slightly by increasing the On-field
