should be easy. Well that is unless you have a Google Home smart speaker, which, at the time of writing, was crashing hard when trying to log into the Google Home app. I had a Google Home Mini since it was released in 2014 and have always been a loyal user of the Google assistant, albeit, barely using it. The Smart Home revolution has finally arrived thanks to services like Amazon's Alexa and I can't help but feel that Google was at best, a little late to the party. After buying my Mini for £49 it felt more like receiving something that was thrown in for free. It felt like it came with a free subscription to the Alphabet channel on YouTube, which might be nice, but it hasn't really added much. Like many people I have loads of queries that I ask every now and then. I can ask questions about the weather, the news, my garden and a million other things, in the past, I would ask my phones. I would tell it to 'play music' and then go and find my phones Spotify app. If you are looking for the weather I would ask my phone, "what's the weather like?" If you are looking for the nearest restaurant, "what's the nearest restaurant?" Now days, I actually have to ask Google. No longer can I just ask a phone, "play music," "what's the weather like?" or "what is the nearest restaurant?" And each time I have to ask it, it takes me to the Google search results. Now, if you are finding Google is a little slow in answering questions, it's not. But Google does seem a little slow in responding to requests. If you ask a person a question, then that is their input into giving an answer. Why do I need voice recognition?
