The nature of airborne Aspergillus spores is well known and from the viewpoint of allergic mechanisms there is no doubt that this germ is a dangerous and hazardous invader in the diseased lung. Aspergillomas are a frequent disease, usually asymptomatic and usually benign. While the life of the patient is usually not endangered by the slow growing aspergillomas, the inability to be curative in many cases with surgical resection after localization with biopsy, chemo- and radiotherapy due to a protracted growth process or on the occasion of known dissemination into the blood circulation or CNS. In addition to the guidelines already existing (the latest guidelines of the DGK, ACG and ENS-Clueb) the following new prognostic parameters have been evaluated: the initial spirometric findings, the degree of dysfunction of the involved bronchus, the appearance of progressive ulcerations and the appearance of other clinical symptoms or symptoms of the CNS. The degree of dyspnea increases in the early course; once more bronchoscopy is indicated, mainly if a bronchial stenosis is shown, and the degree of bronchial dysfunction is not elucidated. A cough may be a symptom of special importance and if progressive, the stenosis is more or less impaired and a surgical resection should be considered. Clinical symptoms of the CNS are of great prognostic significance and if present a resection of the aspergilloma should be contemplated. Glucagon-like peptide-1 receptor stimulation attenuates extracellular matrix accumulation in balloon-injured carotid arteries of diet-induced obese rats. The glucagon-like peptide-1 (GLP-1) receptor is a promising target for cardiovascular disease. However, the effects of GLP-1 receptor stimulation on arterial remodeling after injury are uncertain. To elucidate these effects, we examined the effects of 3a67dffec
