By that point, the cost of creating "Free Software" is essentially zero. Just work on the infrastructure, and everyone can pick up the work where others left off, since we all have the same goal in mind. This is a big part of why "proprietary software" has such a huge advantage over "Free Software", because we have to pay for it in the first place. How it Works, Then So, how does "Free Software" actually work, once it's up and running? First, we need a shared list of rules and documentation for use in our community. When we use the Free Software Definition to figure out what an operating system must and must not do, we have to translate it into simple terms and human language. This is a list of policies we choose to follow, without which we cannot call our software Free Software. It is built on shared understanding of the "American Law", and does not say anything about the specific software we're building. We invent the specific details, and the community has to work together to make sure that the details chosen work and are just. Once we have chosen these policies, and adopted them as the accepted way of sharing our work and making a contribution, we can focus on making our software do what it was originally designed to do. Software for a server, for example, must be able to manage a bunch of different users and different jobs in order to run. It must be able to read a bunch of different input data, and store a bunch of different information that will make sense in the context of what the software is trying to do. The Free Software Foundation has a long tradition of focusing on the e79caf774b

After the user inputs a valid last name and an invoice type, this is my code for (order_id, order) in orders_by_person: if order.client.last_name == name_input and order.invoice_type == inv_type: print (order.client.last_name + 'is'+ order.invoice_type + 'and entered correctly') I could shorten it but how would I create that same loop with just one loop A: Why not just use dict lookup: orders_by_person = {} if order_id, order in orders_by_person: if order.client.last_name == name_input and order.invoice_type == inv_type: print (order.client.last_name + 'is'+ order.invoice_type + 'and entered correctly') If you just need to check if the name matches, you don't have to look it up again in the dictionary. A: You could do something like: for order in orders_by_person: if order.client.last_name == name_input and order.invoice_type == inv_type: print (order.client.last_name + 'is'+ order.invoice_type + 'and entered correctly') And when you have more than 1 order, you can use: for order in (x for x in orders_by_person if x.client.last_name == name_input and x.invoice_type == inv_type): print (order.client.last_name + 'is'+ order.invoice_type + 'and
