A venogram study of patients with isolated idiopathic deep vein thrombosis (DVT) revealed abnormalities in more than 80% of the population. These abnormalities may be acquired or inherited. This study was designed to examine, in a population of unselected patients with DVT, whether there was an association between the age, sex, and ethnicity of patients and the prevalence of abnormalities in the study population. We examined 1268 consecutive patients with DVT: 688 idiopathic and 580 post-phlebitic. Hypercoagulability was defined as a positive result for at least one of the following tests: lupus anticoagulant, protein C or S deficiency, antiphospholipid antibody and an abnormality in thrombophilic screening. The prevalence of hypercoagulability in the study population was 31%. Patients with idiopathic DVT were less likely to be hypercoagulable than those with post-phlebitic DVT (39% vs 59%, P = 0.01). In patients with idiopathic DVT, there was a positive association with increasing age and the prevalence of hypercoagulability (23-35% vs 61-72%, P = 0.0001). Females were less likely to be hypercoagulable than males (19% vs 44%, P = 0.0001). Patients with ethnic origins in a Western European population were more likely to be hypercoagulable than those with an ethnic origin from a non-Western European population (54% vs 33%, P = 0.0001). Age, sex and ethnicity are factors in the development of venographic abnormalities and their prevalence in patients with idiopathic DVT is significantly higher than in those with post-phlebitic DVT. The high prevalence in patients of ethnic origins from a Western European population is consistent with the findings of a previous study of Greek patients with DVT.
