Q: nodejs vs golang for game development I have a background of Python and recently built a web application with Django. Currently I am looking to build a web application that will run a game based on an initial concept. I was looking at Golang as I have heard it is a strong contender for web development. I am also looking for a good nodejs javascript example. My question is from the two that I am familiar with can one of them be used to build a server side game? Any good examples of nodejs/javascript game development would be appreciated. A: Thanks for the question. There are two main areas of NodeJS that one would look to use for game development: NodeJS as a backend: A NodeJS process is as close to a server (and does the same kinds of things) as you would ask for. Depending on your use case this may provide you with some more horsepower/resources. If you are building a web application, the idea of a separate server for each app is sort of quaint. Most web apps run in a single container (NodeJs) and serve requests to/from the backend (NodeJS). If you have a need for lots of separate dedicated servers then Node is not your best friend. NodeJS as a frontend: Like web apps, NodeJS frontend applications will run in a container. NPM and similar tools make it easy to run things without having a massive build step. In combination with things like three.js the front end aspects of games can be as simple to build as the web. I have a bunch of thoughts on this, but that may be better answered by other sources so I'll let others fill that out.
