ine of your Own Story. Here's a post you've been waiting for (review pending). If you think this book is trash, please let me know. Until then, what do you think? I recently set out to read a few novels that, in my mind, walked the fine line between character and plot. I liked the first two fine enough but didn't quite find any that clicked. Then, I read how the protagonist in Colleen Hoover's book "Legally Blonde" cheated on her college sweetheart to try to win him back, and I realized the most glaring deficit of her story: she wasn't the heroine. She wasn't at the center of the story, and that was even more apparent when I read the second volume, "Sex and the City 2". Hers is a story most definitely focused on women, but did I feel like the character was the hero? No. Does it pass the Bechdel test? Yes. Is it an interesting character? In some ways, sure. But it's not a story the main characters are at the center of, and that's what made the second one so unique and fun. From the very beginning, the other characters revolved around the main characters in one way or another. The problem with Harriet Gumm, for example, is that she was sort of the bad girl of the book. She was really sort of the showboat of the ensemble cast. The story is about Charlotte and Carrie, yet we learn of Harriet's existence early enough into the book that anyone who starts watching would still know it was about a "chick and her three best friends in New York City" by the end of the book. Yet the book as a whole also goes to great lengths to educate us on the history of the "girl's best friend," tying it back to her inclusion here. In fact, the book begins by opening with a sort of black and white essay on Harriet and how it is important that the book is written. Hector's death, of course, is important in the long run, yet it's not the book's most important moment. It's the friendship between the three. The book's core concerns are seen through their love, and the best friends have their ups and downs along the way. Carrie's soap opera life, for example, puts Charlotte's and Hector's status as friends (and Carol's friendship with Charlotte) into question. Amongst the women, the reader knows that they are the

you must complete a series of contracts around the Moon. Each contract has a gold deposit and a bounty attached, but the amount of gold will always be smaller than the amount of bounty. Furthermore, during your travels, you will be trying to escape from the attention of Reavers that will instantly kill you if they find you. During the game, you will also encounter other items and creatures that you can use for your own purposes. Gameplay: The game starts out in an exterior world where you can switch between three different characters, and can freely roam around. You gain control of your Gravity Bubble by turning to the left or right on the analog stick, and pressing the corresponding direction button. You must solve a series of contracts for the bounty's gold, which you can then use to purchase items and increase your Power (up to level 10). Contracts can be solved by a variety of means. For example, you can release the gravity bubble by pressing the d-pad up and then the button in the character display (which shows the Power level). Once the bubble is released, you control the protagonist as they run out of the bubble. You can control both the main protagonist and the secondary protagonist (created for each contract) using the d-pad. You can also use the ZL and ZR buttons to activate special abilities for the main and secondary protagonists (e.g. slow-time, release a gravity bubble, or activate smoke bombs). An overview of the terrain and contracted area appears in the display, and you can freely look around the world. You have five standard weapons with different properties. You can also purchase special items during the game. Contracts: Escape: The first contract is to escape from the Reavers' enemies. You first need to escape from Reaver's camp. Then, you will be chased by Reavers. Once you manage to escape from them, you must escape from the re-captured Reaver ship and the area controlled by them. Hidden Teleporter: This contract requires you to locate two small objects with a hidden code. You enter the code and then follow a teleporter to the hidden object. Key Blast: Find the key before the time runs out. The primary contestant's face will display a
