The value of cleaning the interdental spaces and the effect of various chemical chelators on the formation of apical dental cemental deposits were investigated in a prospective randomized study. Each of 48 patients underwent one of three treatments: no treatment, half-mouth interdental scaling, or 1-2 applications of 20% sodium-ascorbate. Twelve patients were treated with 0.5% Hexavac chelator, whereas the remaining 36 patients received TETRA. Both tests showed significantly less apical cemental deposits in the treated teeth. They also suggest that chelating agents are very effective in preventing the accumulation of these cements.
