Jan- I can't speak for everyone, but for me, the legitimate process of getting up, indeed the entire process, from the acknowledgement that there are problems to actually getting up and doing something about them is hard. Sometimes I refer to it as "hard work." I've become very used to the message "what is easy is good, right?" That is, usually easy work is good work, in so far as it results in immediate improvement. With that in mind, once a person is engaged in working on a problem, if it doesn't get easier and easier, it's hard work. Hard work can often get results eventually. It's just that there are generally more people working on a particular problem. I'm now in a position, as mentioned, where I have no choice. There are only two outcomes. I can either learn to accept that I will not be able to cope, and give up. Or accept that recovery seems impossible, because in fact it is, and thus learn to cope. It's the ultimate test of seriousness that you don't cope anymore. You don't forget how to cope, but rather how to cope with your coping. Over time, I see that solutions will be found. Even if the solutions are just accepting what is. There is always a "product" here I can learn to cope with. Jan — Absolutely, but in the meantime, the only thing I've learned is that progress is spacy. Progress is day to day. Progress is one metric away a-R-Bridge-ee-Cantalope-its-gonna-be-awesomely-busy-but-relaxing/ 27 Jun 2014 In the final instalment of my series on the Cantaloupe version of LoveLoveLoveEsperanza, I thought we'd look at the feeling that can be generated by being intimately involved with the words themselves. It's taken me ages to try to explain what I mean by this, because the simple word 'feeling' fails to describe the experience. Hopefully I can do better now that you've seen how my comics are created. So here goes. For me, the magical aspect of performing a piece of literature as a musical work is not the luscious and subtly hidden melodies, or the deeply moved lyricism, but more abstractly, in the sense that a 'feeling' can be generated by the written words themselves. In music, there are many ways in which a feeling can be created. It can be conceptual, such as the idea that 'you are' feeling happy. But for my Cantaloupe version the feeling has to have a physical manifestation on stage. My goal is to create a stronger 'physical' reason for performing a piece of literature, a more 'physical' reason for creating a piece of music, by transforming the musical language of words into musical sound. Why do I feel this? According to Gregor D'Ausilio, who I quoted about feeling in the previous post, there are three categories of feeling: Emotional, Sensual, and Intellectual. He describes two of these as 'natural feelings' and the third as 'aesthetic feeling'. As for Emotional Feeling: the closest you can get to this sort of feeling by listening to music is a 'momentary' feeling of joy, or sadness, or fear that you cannot explain. Unless it doesn't fit with the tonality of the music, or you have a rich musical background with musical training, you don't really get much out of such a 'momentary' feeling. You can get this sort of 'natural' feeling by watching a opera or musical film, but to the Cantaloupe audience it doesn't go deep enough. As for Sens
