I have done most of the calculations which are rather simple, however when I try to divide a float point number (a number that can hold an infinite number of decimals) by a float point number (which can hold only finite decimals) it is still showing as 0. float area = (((width * height) / 100) / 100); I am using a float point number because I want to have the most precision possible (I am calculating a large number of points). I have tried converting both sides to an integer and then dividing, however it still gives me 0 on the right hand side of the equation. What should I be doing instead to get a correct output? Edit: I am trying to get the area of the triangle (length x width) divided by the area of the circle (radius^2). A: The operands of / have to match in type. Since they don't, the result is meaningless. You need to do this: float area = (((width * height) * 100) / 100.0f); Since 100 is an int type, the result is then an int type as
