Q: Why is

XSS so much more likely than SQL Injection? I've heard many times that XSS is much more likely than SQL injection. What are the odds of one attack vs the other? A: XSS can be more likely than SQLi, but it's also hard to execute. SQLi is easier to execute, but it's not very likely to be successful. I'd say it's much harder to write a successful SQLi attack than a successful XSS attack.

Power-A-Pult: a prenatal ultrasound screening tool for trisomy 21. Prenatal detection of chromosomal abnormalities, including trisomy 21, is a major challenge to health professionals and the public. This study examined the accuracy of a tool based on the principle of power-A-pulsation in combination with a sound waveform evaluation for the detection of trisomy 21 during prenatal ultrasound. The present study consisted of five stages: (i) design of a computer algorithm; (ii) development of computer software; (iii) generation of test data; (iv) evaluation of computer programs; and (v) cross-validation using additional expert reviews. On average, the computerized algorithm detected a statistically significant increase in trisomy 21 cases over the investigator's manual detection of cases. The average sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value (PPV) and negative predictive value (NPV) for the computerized system were 73%, 62%, 82% and 56%, respectively. The average sensitivity, specificity, PPV and NPV for a second set of computerized analysis of three, three and four layers, respectively, were higher than for the original three-layer algorithm. The sensitivity and PPV values for the computerized algorithm for the second set of computerized analysis were significantly higher than for manual detection by the investigators. The computerized algorithm is feasible
