What's new in Zoo Empire:

is a graphics library designed to make OpenGL programming easy by allowing developers to work in a strongly type, object-oriented manner. The library is a C++11 object model which is superior to OpenGL, in terms of typing and debugging, giving us the ability to leverage the same style of programming with C++ as we already employ with C. Being C++, the library inherits an extensive ecosystem of built-in classes, types, and functions, giving us access to a vast collection of often-used and heavily tested functionality that is not available in OpenGL itself. Prismatic is designed as a high-level abstraction of OpenGL, focusing on functions used to manipulate the GL texture surface, framebuffer objects, and shader program. It allows you to write OpenGL code using an object-oriented programming model, thereby giving you the power to develop applications that interface with OpenGL in an object-oriented manner, without the necessity of writing a framework or engine specifically designed to do so. Using Prismatic to code OpenGL applications is actually quite simple. To get started, you need a text editor, a file system, the C++ compiler (most of the time, anyway), and OpenGL capable hardware (see the Support for Prismatic's full capabilities page for more details). In the following example, we show how to render a basic 2D game, saving the result to a file. The example is rather simplistic, consisting only of two screens, two triangles, and a square. Prismatic has very little of the raw OpenGL-level boilerplate it adds in when using C++. This gives us the power to adopt a traditional C-style object-oriented programming approach, with the structs we need to achieve our tasks rather than the rather pointless classes and the opaque configuration settings the often variety of corporate template engines add in. For most of the following example, we will be setting up the basic game context called `context`, containing references to an FBO the texture, and an shader program: Notice the use of the Functor, DemoTexture, and Shader constants class templates. From these single declarations, we can get access to many of Prismatic's functions. For example, the following code obtains a reference to the Texture passed to the gl::Initialize fcn: DemoTexture gets two
