BTC is trading at $12,970 in what will likely be the first high of 2016. However, as the piece of online service conducted the research on bitcoin, its more credible counterpart, the euro, surpassed the $1,400 mark. This is also likely to be the first time the currency has seen a price surge of over 50 percent in a calendar year. Bitcoin Price Surges: Not a New Thing Over the past six months, there has been a huge shift in perception of bitcoin. Its price has risen by 4500 percent, and a high correlation exists between the world's number-one crypto-currency and the world's stock market. Another crypto-currency, ethereum, has seen a price increase of 300 percent. In the past 12 months, the currency has broken the $100 mark, and is currently trading at about $917. This significant shift in the market places it on the brink of becoming a legitimate financial asset. However, as BTC prices continue to rise, more people are being made aware of the existence of the currency. In March, for example, bitcoin was identified by experts to be a potential alternative to traditional finance. As bitcoin becomes increasingly mainstream, the currency is turning heads at an incredible pace. At the end of last year, the world's leading bitcoin exchange, BitStamp, reported $1.2 billion worth of trades in December. In January, its amount shot up to $1.9 billion. In February, with some analysts predicting the rise of bitcoin could be the equivalent of a $10 billion industry, figures reached over $5 billion in monthly trades. Perhaps the biggest boost in monthly volume came in March, with the market volume reaching $8.2 billion. At the start of the month, an equihash hack resulted in 5,000 of the bitcoins being frozen. However, this was a significant
