However, current transformation systems for higher plants are impeded by the labor-intensive steps of individual transformation using DNA constructs containing selectable markers. Recent work has shown that genes can be inserted at defined loci of Arabidopsis thaliana by the triparental mating method using Agrobacterium tumefaciens. In this approach, two independent T-DNA carrying different selectable markers are simultaneously introduced into the plant cell, which is followed by selection of transformants. We developed a large-scale T-DNA tagging method using Agrobacterium-mediated transformation. The construct used in this study contains a single T-DNA carrying a kanamycin resistance (KanR) cassette and several T-DNA fragments containing the inverted border sequence (IBS) sequence of the target locus. Agrobacterium containing the construct was used to infect embryonic stem cells, and KanR-resistant callus clones were selected. The IBS region of the translocated T-DNA was PCR-amplified and sequenced. In total, 1,900 callus clones from four different genotypes of Arabidopsis were obtained. Gene tagging was detected in 1,098 clones, yielding a frequency of approximately 55%. Our result suggests that a large-scale tagging approach using a single construct can be carried out in a short period of time, and T-DNA fragments with IBS sequences can be easily transferred into plant cells.
