Studies have been made on the clinical reactogenicity of anti-insulin antibodies in insulin-dependent diabetics. The study included 43 patients who had been administered with human insulin over a period of at least 6 months and who were clinically stable. Of the 43 patients, 4 had been treated with penicillin and 2 with cephalosporins, as a prophylactic measure, before initiation of human insulin. In 27 patients (62%) a significantly (p less than 0.05) elevated blood glucose value was observed. Correspondingly, three of these patients showed, with regard to the occurrence of symptoms of hypoglycemia, a significantly (p less than 0.05) higher number of episodes. When the patients were compared with healthy controls, a significantly (p less than 0.001) higher percentage of patients with elevated blood glucose values (66% vs. 20%) was found. No significant differences were observed in the incidence of hypoglycemia between the study patients and the controls (27% vs. 18%). In the 4 patients receiving penicillin or cephalosporin before initiation of human insulin, no significant elevation of blood glucose values could be detected. Furthermore, no significant differences in the incidence of hypoglycemia were observed between the drug-treated patients and the controls. The results obtained indicate a potential risk of administering insulin in diabetics who
