When using Photoshop, it is important to know that each layer acts as a different layer and that each layer can be moved, deleted, resized, and manipulated individually. It is also important to understand that a layer is, at its base, a rectangle that contains an image and is accessible through the Layers menu. The Layers window, on the left-hand side of the Photoshop window, is where you can access the Layers window, which is where you can access the various layers in the document (or, if one is currently selected, that layer is the foreground layer). You can also manipulate the layers from within the Layers window—e.g., you can change the layer's opacity, move it, even combine it with other layers. You can also manipulate the layers from within the Layers window—e.g., you can change the layer's opacity, move it, even combine it with other layers. Understanding Photoshop Layers In order to understand the Layers window, it is important to understand its purpose. With the layers window, you can see all of the layers in a document (or image) and can access different layers individually. Each layer can be manipulated individually, even if they are manipulated in the same way. This is helpful, as it enables you to see and correct mistakes as you make them. It also enables you to work on one layer and then see what happens when you move it. The Layers window provides an overview of the layers in your image and gives you a visual representation of each layer's purpose and place in the image. There are various components and functions in the Layers window, including: Layers These are the layers that are contained within a document and are all displayed in the Layers window. The Layers window is just one of the ways to view the layers in a document. You may also need to do this via the Layer palette. Layers Menu The Layers window allows you to add, delete, and manipulate the layers. The menu in the window's header also provides options to change the order in which the layers are displayed, rename a layer, and move a layer up or down. Image Menu Located at the top of the Layers window, the options available are the tools for moving layers on top of each other or below other layers.

So, what's the best way to get rid of them? For starters, you have a couple of options. For a quick trip to the trash bin (with a fast Photoshop program), select the unwanted color in the Color panel's Swatches panel and choose Delete from the keyboard or press Delete. You can also choose Edit→Delete (or use the keyboard shortcut Ctrl+D) to remove colors. # Note For more on the Color panel, see The Color Panel. Using the Black & White adjustment is another way to remove color from an image. With an image open in Photoshop, go to Image→Adjustments→Black & White. The Black & White dialog box opens. At the top of the dialog box, the image is displayed with a white canvas. However, the colors below are represented in black and white. To further specify how colors are removed, you can use sliders and a color picker (see Figure 7-22). Figure 7-22. You can use the Black & White dialog box to remove a color from an image. You can use three types of sliders to remove the color: the Hue slider, the Saturation slider, and the

Backup to Google Drive - mohkohn ===== mohkohn Interesting that most answers seem to be to the first question that comes to mind. Backing up data offsite seems to be seen as a low priority for users. The fact that it's not _backing up_, is surprising. ~~~ whb07 Probably the obvious, "who is watching the watchers" angle. I'm part of a team that builds an enterprise video service. We've had to deal with a ton of companies offering security reasons why they won't give you a backup from them when you're spending so much time and money on getting them online. Our solution was the same as everyone else, but backed up to a different location. Customers are happy because they still get what they need, and we don't have the same conversations that we used to. We're certainly not the only ones in this game, but that was the angle I had in mind when reading your reply. ~~~ hunterloftis This is why I've started backing up to a channel in Firebase. You can make a channel that points to a public URL and you can use Cloud Functions to monitor that channel and handle any changes to the blob when it happens. ~~~ devmunchies This is EXACTLY why I use rsync to copy over my bucket to heroku every time I make a change. I would never want to rely on cloud functions or firebase or any other third party service for that matter. ----- miguelrochefort I never thought of this. I guess it's pretty good to have your data's infrastructure in the same place. But you don't seem to have a real strategy to keep things up to date. I know our infrastructure has changed from day one to day 6, why wouldn't you plan to also keep up to date your online backup? ~~~ jasonlotito What? The conversation here has nothing to do with backup. ~~~ miguelrochefort Isn't it to prevent data loss? ~~~ jasonlotito There is no saying it prevents data loss
