a systematic review. In outpatient surgery, patients' satisfaction relates to their expectations of the interpersonal skills of their physicians. We aimed to review and summarise the literature relating to patient perception of and satisfaction with interaction with their physician in outpatient endoscopy. A systematic search was performed according to the PRISMA criteria in June 2014. Only articles published in the past 10 years were included. Searches were limited to English language with no constraints in date, study design or participants. Articles meeting these criteria were assessed for quality. Ten studies met the inclusion criteria. Studies were heterogeneous in aim and population; seven studies reviewed endoscopy screening/diagnosis and three studies examined outpatient endoscopy procedures. Studies used different methods to assess patients' expectations of their physicians' interpersonal skills; two studies administered a questionnaire directly after the consultation, one study collected these data from medical records, and one study used an interview. All studies found that the majority of patients either
