A single-piece rocker assembly is typically mounted to a platform between two openable hopper portions of the material handling system. To mount a single-piece rocker assembly, it is known to use a mounting shaft that is mounted to a first openable hopper portion, a bearing assembly that is mounted to the mounting shaft and that supports the rocker assembly, and a transmission shaft that is mounted to the rocker assembly and that is connected to an actuator for driving the rocker assembly. The bearing assembly is typically a ball bearing assembly, as the ball bearing's use in combination with the mounting shaft allows for very precise mounting. In the event of a failure of the ball bearing, the entire mounting shaft and rocker assembly must be replaced. Such a requirement for replacing a whole rocker assembly can be costly. Additionally, it can be time consuming to replace the entire rocker assembly, which is typically replaced as a unit. In an effort to increase the durability of bearing assemblies used in rocker assemblies, manufacturers have attempted to replace a portion of the bearing assembly with a forged bearing portion and to increase the hardness of the mounting shaft and rocker assembly. However, the mounting shafts and rocker assemblies of the prior art have been comprised of steel, which has a low hardness value. The low hardness value can make a forged bearing portion more prone to wear in conjunction with the soft mounting shaft and rocker assembly. In addition, a single ball bearing typically uses between 100 to 120 balls. Ball bearings are known to wear balls at an accelerated rate when used to support a rocker assembly. The accelerated wear of the balls can make the balls fall off of the bearings, which can further accelerate the rate of wear of the bearings. As such, there is a need for a rocker assembly that is capable of withstanding wear and tear of a bearing assembly and/or that is able to withstand the loads experienced by the rocker assembly during operation
