Postnatal depression, following childbirth, is a prevalent condition that persists for 6-12 months. Several socio-demographic correlates have been found to be associated with postnatal depression. The present study investigated the prevalence of postnatal depression as well as the relation between a set of variables that is known to be associated with postnatal depression. The sample was 218 first-time mothers from a suburban district in the northeast part of the Netherlands. In this study a generalized linear model (GLM) was used to analyse the data. Sociodemographic characteristics were tested as predictors of postnatal depression. We found that the number of infants in a family, education and the practice of an ethnic minority were found to be predictors of postnatal depression. The practice of ethnic minority mothers and a larger family were found to protect against the onset of postnatal depression. Among the women who took part in the study, postnatal depression was found to affect 8.4%. Variables such as the number of infants in a family and education, were found to be predictors of the onset of postnatal depression. Although prevention and screening efforts aimed at mothers should be continued, it is clear that there is a need to take the practice of ethnic minority mothers into account in order to lower the prevalence of this condition. Performance, persistence, and recovery of Earthworms (Lumbricus terrestris) in a re-vegetated soil following chemical contamination. The toxic potential of various pesticides and heavy metals, released into the soil during chemical farming operations, may be a hazard to public health. In this study, the potential for long-term toxic effects of soil contaminants and secondary poisoning by post-methane treatment diet were evaluated for
