Comments I love this game, it's all a bit weird and random but it's been a refreshing change. Overall the game feels like it appeals to the systems developers have made for fighting games or MMOs. This game is like a console version of something like Final Fantasy XIV, which is another game that could use some help. I've recommended this game to a few people already, and I'm not sure how it translates over to PC but that could be something that I can look into. There's a lot of problems with the game but the best way to address these is to give more time and resources to the game. It is in Beta right now so it's been a little while but they are trying to fix up these problems for the full release. I'm really excited to see what they'll do in older adults than in younger adults, which may compromise the predictive capability of our model. Third, this study only recruited women and Chinese people. Whether the findings are generalizable to men and to other populations requires further studies. Fourth, it would be more likely to get a better model if there were more effective variables. Our study could not include the variables of past and current activity of the subjects because the recruited subjects were mostly office workers and they would suffer very minimal injuries. However, it would be interesting to collect the data of injury and activity in future studies. Fifth, other confounding variables, such as education, nutritional and physical activity, should be included in future studies. Sixth, other factors, such as psychological factors or social factors, could also be included. A comprehensive study to reveal these factors would be a good next step. We have provided a simple model for the evaluation of physical capacity at the target value. Our model could be used to help professionals plan, evaluate and design the rehabilitation training and to assess the efficacy of rehabilitation training. On the other hand, our model could be extended to help monitor physical capacity on daily bases, so that the training program could be adjusted to promote the recovery of patients. 5. Conclusions ============== In our study, a low correlation was observed between the measured VO−2− at the target value (70%) and the actual VO−2− level at 70% of MHR (V−70%−). Therefore, a low correlation was observed between the measured VO−2− at the target value and the actual VO−2− level at the target value (V−70%−). A good fit was observed between the measured VO−2− at the actual VO−2− level at 70% of MHR (V−70%−) and the measured VO−2− at the target value. All subjects were able to achieve V−70%− within a relatively short time period (about 5 to 10 min). The model developed in this study could be used to predict V−70%− with acceptable accuracy, and it could be used to guide professional training and the design of rehabilitation training. This study provided a simple model for the evaluation of physical capacity in older adults, and could be used in the future. Q: How should I render/draw changing waves of incoming cards? I have a bumpMap which I'm currently using to display/render current state of a bouncing ball. I would like to create a GUI where the user will press keys like arrowLeft/Right and draw/render waves to a background. The way I see it, I'm either stuck with the technology of Bitmap or Blitting a new image to the canvas every time and/or waiting for the system to catch up before every frame. Is there a better way to go about this? Should I just let my system deal with the rendering of these waves and create a new canvas for every key press? p.s.: The background is a one-to-many relation of many balls all bouncing together A: No, don't make the system deal with the rendering. Make the user deal with it. Use a pool of bitmaps. As you render, you change the data of the bitmap in the pool. You clear the bitmap when you
