A growing body of evidence demonstrates that activated caspase-1, a protease (caspase-1/ICE/NALP-3) that functions as an initiator caspase in the inflammasome/inflammatory caspase cascade, plays a role in the pathophysiology of ischemic heart disease (IHD). Caspase-1, once thought to have a limited role in inflammation, is now identified as an activator of both canonical and non-canonical inflammasome-regulated interleukin-1 (IL-1) activity as well as being an important mediator of interleukin-18 (IL-18) pyroptotic cell death. In animal models of IHD, caspase-1 has been shown to be upregulated in activated leukocytes, heart tissue and cardiac myocytes. Interestingly, inhibiting caspase-1 activation in a rat model of IHD diminished myocardial apoptosis, improved cardiac function and ultimately prolonged survival. These findings are supported by observations that show higher levels of active caspase-1 and IL-1-binding protein in serum and myocardium of patients with IHD. Similarly, serum levels of the active form of IL-18 were elevated in myocard
