Early diagnosis and subsequent intervention are the keys to treating foot wounds resulting from diabetes mellitus (DM). For the purposes of pathologic examination, the standard method of obtaining the specimen is to remove the full-thickness layers of skin, including both dermis and epidermis. The authors investigated the ability of a partial-thickness specimen to allow the accurate diagnosis of diabetic foot ulceration. Full-thickness specimens were obtained from 17 patients with known DM and foot ulcers, and compared to partial-thickness specimens obtained from the same sites. The mean age of the patients was 50.8 years (range, 34-62 years). The ulcers were venous in seven patients, neuropathic in seven patients, and a combination of venous and neuropathic in three patients. The mean wound size was 5.6 +/- 1.7 cm².
