The San Diego Union-Tribune filed an appeal of an injunction restraining the paper from publishing a sensitive security classified national defense document, according to a source who works for the newspaper. That document, which I obtained, details the US Department of Defense's so-called "five-year plan" to create a US military "Space Force" branch and determine how to defend "space assets" against "adversaries" including Russia and China. Its publication is being challenged by the government, which wants the government to keep the document confidential until other government agencies such as the Air Force have had a chance to review it. The military argues that if the document is released to the public, it would endanger US security. The government is required to designate certain documents as "TOP SECRET" and place them under military control, but many others are designated as "SECRET," or "CONFIDENTIAL," which are considered to be less sensitive. This is the first document ever to be designated as TOP SECRET. The document "is a serious attack on the authority and constitutional prerogatives of the executive branch," says a source who requested anonymity. "It's a real threat to the security of the nation." The media's role in protecting the secrecy of national defense documents isn't often discussed. But the media have a responsibility to determine when a nation's security is imperiled and report about it. And when the government orders the media to withhold a document, the media have a duty to challenge those requests even if they disagree with the government's decision. It's not often the media are able to make the government acknowledge a mistake and reverse a decision to withhold a document. But there is precedent for it. In 2016, the New York Times went to court to demand the release of a classified intelligence report about Russian election meddling and the firing of James Comey. The Times' decision to make this disclosure triggered sharp criticism from the government and especially the CIA, which had approved the document for release. But the NYT was able to prevail in court, and the government later declassified the document. In this case, the Times is supporting the Union-Tribune's appeal and the newspaper has more legal rights to demand release of documents than the government does. Under a law known as

Q: Must all data transaction be immediately written to disk? I was learning about transactions in database programming and I encountered some confusion regarding how it works. I read this The concept is that you create a transaction at the start of an operation, including a read (i.e. load or retrieve) statement. When this is complete, the transaction is committed. If an error occurs within the transaction, the whole operation is rolled back and the changes to the data in the database are not recorded. So, I understand that most DBMS (MySQL, PostgreSQL, SQL Server) support various types of transaction and only the read (or select) statement gets committed immediately after the end of transaction. What I don't understand is why there are no read (or load) statements during transaction. Isn't it necessary to go back to the beginning of the transaction (after the read(or load) statements) to rollback the transaction with the read (or load) statements? And hence all the data must be written to disk immediately? Update (after thinking about the answer): With one exception: when a select statement (read) gets committed, the rows are written to disk in some way. That is, the SELECT statement was not rolled back in rollback of a transaction. But in the case of a transaction on a table, I suppose the select statements are in the form of UPDATE or INSERT and they are not rolled back. So, why does it say "The transaction is committed when the last write is complete"? A: Databases maintain dirty data in memory. Storing a record in a table must include reading that record and updating it into the dirty data. If a read fails, the dirty data is still kept in memory and can be abandoned. When a commit is requested on a transaction, the dirty data is copied from memory into the database, so that all the changes within a transaction are eventually captured to a point-in-time consistent database state.
