Exporting to the Web The Web doesn't support the 8-bit formats and limited color that JPEGs are designed to work with. JPEGs can get very large files, up to hundreds of megabytes or even gigabytes. For this reason, it's important to compress the file before you export it to the Web. The compression technique used is called the JPEG format. If you want to know about the trade-offs between having an uncompressed or compressed image on the Web, check out "Exporting images as a series of screenshots" on page 264. When you export a JPEG from Photoshop, you have two options for how the image will be displayed on the Web: * As a thumbnail (called a `_thumbnail_`) * As a full-size image (called a `_page-size_`) In previous versions of Photoshop, you couldn't select a JPEG export option. All you could do was choose the type of image to export, whether it was a thumbnail or full-size image, and how many copies you wanted. However, starting with version CS3 you have the option of exporting in JPEG format with several different sizes for the resulting files. These sizes include the following: * 800 pixels wide by 600 pixels high * 1024 pixels wide by 768 pixels high * 1200 pixels wide by 1024 pixels high * 1600 pixels wide by 1200 pixels high * 2048 pixels wide by 1536 pixels high *

Q: Show more/less per page I have a webpage that has a lot of data. Is there a way to show more/less on each page? The amount of data is dynamic. I have been looking at overflow-x: scroll;, but that didn't seem to do it. A: The easiest way is to just add an ajax request. Because it's dynamic, you'll need to cache things like the loading bar, etc. It's also easier to just use scroll bars when you have a lot of data. A: You could use an extension such as iScroll or Thootchen to let the user scroll in the browser. You will have to figure out how to limit the amount of data you are displaying, otherwise you'll just be wasting time and bandwidth transferring huge chunks of data that the user will never actually use.
