Support 64-Bit Windows 7, 8, 8.1 and 10.Q: Convert LaTeX expression to Python without rendering the result? I'm still trying to learn LaTeX. In particular, I'm using python-docx and want to insert math formulas (like a+b) into a word document. (Note, this is not an active document, it is to be used for reference in later. I am writing it up in a for loop at the moment.) In short, I want to convert a LaTeX expression into a Python expression, without rendering the result. Ideally, the Python rendering would be direct and non-visual. I realize that if the result is visual, and you don't want to display it, you can make the result look like other text (and I will do that), but ideally, I just want to get the Python expression that I can use for comparison. I know that there are functions that will do this (like math.eval and compile), but I'm hoping to use simpler versions of those that I can handle using only the Python API. I can't just insert a mathematical expression into a Python string, as I need to manipulate it using Python code. That is, I can't just insert something like \frac{a}{b} into a Python string as that will be rendered when
