Dichloro-m-xylene causes developmental and behavioural teratogenicity in the American bullfrog, Rana catesbeiana. Dichloro-m-xylene is used to make plasticizers and as a component of neonicotinoid insecticides. In Europe, it has been banned since 2003, but has been used as a high-concentration fragrance ingredient in the US since the 1970s. The effects of this compound on the developing embryo and offspring of amphibians have, to our knowledge, never been reported. The purpose of this study was to assess the effects of dichloro-m-xylene on embryonic development of American bullfrogs (Rana catesbeiana) and subsequent offspring behaviour. Embryonic toxicity was assessed in two experiments: (i) LC50 and NOEC determinations in a static water exposure, and (ii) development and hatching rates in a water-accelerated exposure. Dichloro-m-xylene was teratogenic to the early-tadpole stage at 17mg/L with rates of 0% and 1.4% (P = 0.04) in two experiments, and had also caused mortality at higher concentrations. Offspring hatching success (60%) was unaffected in the accelerated exposure. Offspring survival to metamorphosis was unaffected at 7-17mg/L in the static water exposure, but mortality was also observed, with higher sensitivity in the water-accelerated test. No adverse behavioural effects were observed in a standard behavioural assessment of tadpoles (using a corn-shredding test) at concentrations ≤ 50 mg/L- 6d1f23a050
