High parathyroid hormone levels are associated with a better outcome in patients with acute ischemic stroke. Hyperparathyroidism is associated with both adverse cardiovascular and cerebrovascular events, but the association with stroke is less clear. This study examined the association between hyperparathyroidism and outcome in patients with ischemic stroke. Consecutive stroke patients were screened for elevated levels of parathyroid hormone using immunoassays. Outcome was assessed using the modified Rankin Scale 6 months after stroke. Of the 611 patients screened, 60 had elevated parathyroid hormone levels. Patients with elevated parathyroid hormone levels were younger and less likely to have atrial fibrillation as comorbidity. They were also less likely to have elevated C-reactive protein levels. Patients with elevated parathyroid hormone levels had better modified Rankin Scale scores 6 months after stroke (P

Infant malnutrition in an urban Emergency Department. Infant malnutrition (IM) is a major public health problem in the United States. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of acute IM in infants presenting to an urban emergency department (ED) and to examine the association of IM with maternal and neonatal characteristics. This was a retrospective chart review of all infants treated at the ED of St. Joseph's Regional Medical Center, Paterson, NJ, between January 1, 1999, and December 31, 1999. Patients who had hyperlactatemia or evidence of sepsis were excluded. Maternal and neonatal demographic and clinical characteristics were abstracted, including prematurity, birth weight, and maternal age, and rates of IM were calculated. There were 1, 6d1f23a050
